JIM

Project Manager

If you've served your country in any branch of the U.S. military, Miner Corporation will offer you the support and stability of a full-time, well-paying job.

After six years as a corpsman in the U.S. Navy and serving across the globe, I came home with a strong desire to find stability in my professional life. When I joined Miner, I had no dock or door experience, but the company was willing to invest in me to serve our customers well in the same way the Navy trained me to serve our country.

Within six months of starting at Miner, I was promoted to service professional. My military experience, discipline, work ethic and Miner's on-the-job training paved the way to continued career advancement. Before long I was promoted again to my current role as project manager, where I oversee nine account executives working on new construction projects and remodels. I'm charged with keeping projects on time and on budget for our customers and keeping information and details flowing smoothly between general construction and subcontracting firms, Miner account executives and end customers.

Each step in my career progression at Miner prepared me for where I am now, helping my teams navigate jobs and making sure work gets done right, right now. I love being able to collaborate with team members to make decisions that best serve our customers.

“If you put in the hard work and prove your worth at Miner, they are ready to help you move up in responsibility as soon as you are ready.”

I find that my military training—particularly my ability to juggle different critical tasks at once—makes Miner the perfect place for a veteran looking for a career after completing your service.
